With its brilliant and interesting illustrations, the possession of every intelligent family, and particularly of those who are desirous of cultivating the taste of the young, is proved by the following testimony of the Literary Editor of the New York Tribune, Jan. 11, 1860.

"The handsome editor of this valuable periodical has placed a few specimens of the taste of the American public, and is especially successful in adapting his illustrations to the requirements of the season. Without entirely overlooking the wants of the literary and artistic circles, his selections consist mainly of interesting historical and biographical sketches, accounts of travels, familiar illustrations of common things, and lively sayings, which give no conspicuous feature in periodical literature, critical discussion, and other matter to which every intelligent reader is supposed to give more attention than to the illustrations. The illustrations are especially valuable to professional men and cultivated persons who have neither time nor money to devote to a promiscuous reading of reviews and magazines, but who wish, with little or no expense, to keep themselves informed on the current condition of English literature. Each number is accompanied by one or more engravings of historical value."
